

Memory fails if I have seen a realization of Macbeth that so captures its sense of confinement and moral entrapment as Dzieci's does. Makbet, in this shadow world, is Shakespeare's play not as plot but as substance. You don't follow it so much as let it wash over you, don't look at it so much as let it immerse you; it's a current in which you are caught. Flashes of illumination come from nowhere, like fins from the deep. This is not a Macbeth that leaves you thinking that human nature is irredeemable, but a cleansing ceremony, cathartic in the ancient sense, that does the opposite – dramatic substance as an agent of purification.
